AP English Literature and Composition
College Board Approved

While sticking predominantly to examples of British literature rather than American counterparts, this course is designed to meet the objectives set out in the AP English Course Description, namely in the development of analytical skills as expressed through reading, discussion and writing.

- Students can expect a quiz for every reading assignment each class period. While these quizzes won't generally test interpretive powers, they will gauge familiarity with the "facts" of a given work.
- All literary units will conclude with a unit test that borrows elements of the AP test. Much of it will be essay writing under timed circumstances and nearly every test will also include literary selections never before seen by the students. As with samples from the AP test, students must interpret these selections and write cogent essays supported by their knowledge of literary devices such as imagery, diction, etc.
- Students will also select a novel each quarter for "outside reading." While the novels may be from any corner of the world, they must all be literary. Writing topics are student-generated with some help from me if necessary. This provides invaluable practice for college writing when students won't simply be given a topic about which to write in their literature classes.
- Students then forge rough drafts for review before the due date. The written feedback gives specific and general guidelines for further revision. Graded papers are likewise handed back with comments. To be more specific on the point I would add that feedback aims at improving the following:
 - students' vocabulary
 - sentence structure (including subordination and coordination)
 - organizational coherence bolstered by smooth transitions and various other rhetorical techniques
 - specific, concrete detail rather than abstraction and loose summary
 - development of a versatile, individual voice through the use of diction, tone and sentence structure

(The previous addition now concretely addresses the following missing requirements.)

The AP teacher provides instruction and feedback on students' writing assignments, both before and after the students revise their work, that help the students develop: a wide-ranging vocabulary used appropriately and effectively.

Lack of evidence

The AP teacher provides instruction and feedback on students' writing assignments, both before and after the students revise their work, that help the students develop: a variety of sentence structures, including appropriate use of subordination and coordination.

The AP teacher provides instruction and feedback on students' writing assignments, both before and after the students revise their work, that help the students develop: logical organization, enhanced by specific techniques to increase coherence, such as repetition, transitions, and emphasis.

Lack of evidence

The AP teacher provides instruction and feedback on students' writing assignments, both before and after the students revise their work, that help the students develop: a balance of generalization and specific, illustrative detail.

Lack of evidence

The AP teacher provides instruction and feedback on students' writing assignments, both before and after the students revise their work, that help the students develop: an effective use of rhetoric, including controlling tone, establishing and maintaining voice, and achieving appropriate emphasis through diction and sentence structure.

Lack of evidence

- Aside from formal essay writing, students also have the opportunity for frequent informal writing during class. As a precursor to class discussion, students take part in a “First Impressions” activity when reading new material in class. This consists, unsurprisingly, of students jotting thoughts, questions and challenges on paper previous to discussion.

(This activity fulfills the following requirement.)

The course includes frequent opportunities for students to write and rewrite formal, extended analyses and timed, in-class responses. The course requires writing to understand: informal, exploratory writing activities that enable students to discover what they think in the process of writing about their reading (such assignments could include annotation, free writing, keeping a reading journal, and response/reaction papers).

Lacks evidence of informal writing to learn

Source: The main source for this course is McDougal Littell’s The Language of Literature: British Literature. Applebee, Arthur N., ed.

Note: All students took an American Literature class the previous year. The novels read in this class are the following:

--The Scarlet Letter

--The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn

--The Red Badge of Courage

--The Great Gatsby

--The Catcher in the Rye

In addition to these five novels, students must select and independently read a contemporary novel (written after 1980).

Beyond the novel, students also read selected short stories (heavy on Poe as well as contemporary authors such as Updike and Barthelme), poetry and essays from Glencoe's American Literature. Beverly Ann Chin, ed.

(The previous section should fulfill the following missing requirement)

Lacks American literature; lacks contemporary literature. If it was covered in a previous prerequisite American literature course, the syllabus should so state, along with a list of authors.

Course Planner

Introduction (How We Write)—One Week

My primary objective at the beginning of the year is to create expectations to which my students will adhere. Nowhere is this more important than in the quality of their writing. Therefore, the first two reading assignments I give are George Orwell's "Politics and the English Language" and Prof. Paul Roberts's "How to Say Nothing in Five Hundred Words." While Orwell covers the theoretical end, Roberts applies practical strategies to attaining clear, concise and evocative writing, or "saying the most with the fewest words" as I call it. Taking shoddy examples of professional or teacher-created writing, we examine approaches to vitalizing and clarifying writing.

Anglo-Saxon Writing—Three Weeks

We start our literary pursuit with Old English lyrics and riddles before tackling the story of Beowulf. Students are taught to look at these writing samples anthropologically, gauging what can be discovered about a culture through the writings it left behind. Among these are "The Wanderer," "The Seafarer," and "The Wife's Lament," in addition to a handful of the old riddles. Through close analysis we seek a picture of the early English—their environment, society, hopes, fears and realities. By the time we get to Beowulf, students have a basic understanding of Anglo-Saxon society, so we are able to focus more on the rhetoric of the scope in creating his larger than life figure. Closely considered are the writer (or in this case the improvising speaker) and his audience. How and why does he go about creating and communicating this hero? Students then implement their learning in making their own epics/mock epics using thematic and stylistic principles applied by the Beowulf poet more than a millennium in the past. This presents students with a good opportunity to produce lively writing without the pressure of detailed analysis.

The Middle Ages—Three Weeks

This unit is obviously dominated by Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Though we won't read all that Chaucer wrote of the pilgrimage, we will cover the General Prologue as well as a couple character prologues and tales. Of primary importance, especially in the General Prologue, is recognition of the subtle and sophisticated Chaucerian irony. This presents as good an opportunity as any to delineate between the narrator and the actual author as a fundamental of irony.

From Chaucer we move on to excerpts from the romances of "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight" and Le Morte de Artur. This age of chivalry provides an interesting contrast to Beowulfian heroics and allows students to investigate and understand the progression of culture and literature. The two excerpts contrast with each other as well, illustrating more and less idealized visions of the old story.

Lastly, we take a look at some ballads, including "Sir Patrick Spens," "Lord Randall," "Barbara Allan," "Get Up and Bar the Door," etc. We compare the style and topics of these ballads to both the Old English elegiac lyric and modern song / balladeering. As with Old English poetry, we will also look at the anthropological implications of these ballads.

The writing focus of this unit centers around The Canterbury Tales as the class performs one more writing assignment that seeks to stir their creative and stylistic powers while limiting analytical pressures. Students find a modern day equivalent to the religious pilgrimage and write a prologue, bringing their knowledge of Chaucerian irony to bear on a couple characters they lead to some destination, whether it be Graceland, Las Vegas or a football stadium.

The Renaissance—Four Weeks

The English Renaissance provides an arena for the exhaustive study of lyric poetry. While I won't mention everything read, the unit can roughly be broken into the following groupings: courtly poetry (Spenser, Wyatt, Marlowe, Raleigh, etc.), masters such as Donne and Shakespeare, Carpe Diem poets (Herrick, Marvell, Lovelace) along with their inspiration, Jonson, and finally Milton (both sonnets and excerpts from Paradise Lost). A significant goal of this unit is an understanding of the sonnet form as we investigate the importance of not only imagery, but of "insignificant" things like enjambment and end stopped lines and how such small details can alter or enhance the meaning of a poem. Two different essays will be produced in this unit. First, students must decide whom they agree with in their visions of love—Marlowe in "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" or Raleigh in "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd." Here students will combine analysis, evaluation and opinion in constructing their arguments. The capstone essay, however, will be the interpretation of a Shakespeare sonnet not included in the anthology. Each student will be tasked with a different poem and instructed to interpret it in terms of its own merit and thematic links to the rest of the sonnet sequence. Emphasis is placed on the operation of conceits and consistent imagery, in addition to the role sonnet structure has in adding meaning to the poem.

King Lear*—Five Weeks

The King Lear unit doesn't actually start with King Lear, but rather the 1960's film adaptation of The Lion in Winter. This isn't designed to burn valuable class time; its intent is to show students that while drama is derived from a written text, it is a visual art. While I don't concur wholeheartedly with Tolkien, I do agree in principle that the plays of Shakespeare can only really exist in performance. In addition to showing the dramatic art through film, many of the issues in the movie happily coincide with those that will be encountered in the play and will provide grounds for comparison in the future weeks. An essay will also be written with students creating their own topics. The art of forming a good thesis (narrow and provocative) will be stressed to break students of the common habit of summarizing.

As we move into King Lear, students will be given necessary background (renaissance drama, Aristotelian conception of tragedy, etc.), but once again, emphasis will be placed on the performance of this text. Most of the play will be read aloud in class, with students taking roles. Each student must also take part in the acting of at least one scene. This will encourage them to think about performance aspects of drama like blocking, which in turn encourages them to move into the minds of the characters. Finally, each student will be charged with "directing" a scene. This essay will include all the elements needed to perform Shakespeare while bound in the nutshell of one's own head. In this essay students must consider motivation, emotion, mood, blocking, props, etc.

The Enlightenment—Two Weeks

Though students read essay excerpts from Francis Bacon in the Renaissance unit, the Enlightenment is the first opportunity we have to really focus on the essay form. Of particular importance will be the concepts of exigency, purpose and audience as we read Defoe, Wollstonecraft, Johnson, Addison and Swift. The prominence of satire in this period will be highlighted with a look at "A Modest Proposal." Students will then combine persuasion and satire to create their own modest proposals based on contemporary issues. We will also study poetic samples by Dryden and Pope, as well as (auto) biographical accounts by Pepys and Boswell.

Romanticism—Five / Six Weeks

After a brief trip through the nonfiction of the Enlightenment, we return to poetry in the Romantic era. The literature of this unit is typical of most high school fare. We read Blake ("Songs of Innocence" and "Songs of Experience"), William Wordsworth, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Lord Byron, Shelley and Keats. More than with most units, we will study how these authors departed from their forbears to create a new style of poetry that emphasized visceral emotion. Through our analysis of the work we will strive to answer the question, "What is each poet's vision of the world and his place in it?" By this time students should have a better grounding in interpretation, so during this unit I will loosen the reins more, allowing them more latitude to put together ideas in small groups before bringing them to the class. Though I would describe my usual approach as student-centered, beginning with this unit it becomes even more so. I have selected the era of individualistic poetics for students to write their college entrance essays answering the prompt of “What makes you a unique individual?” The unit’s more analytical essay asks students to choose any two poems from the Enlightenment and Romanticism, comparing them culturally and artistically to demonstrate how differing styles contribute to the different tones and themes representative of each period.

(This assignment satisfies the following requirement)

The course includes frequent opportunities for students to write and rewrite formal, extended analyses and timed, in-class responses. The course requires writing to evaluate: analytical, argumentative essays in which students draw upon textual details to make and explain judgments about a work's artistry and quality, and its social and cultural values. Lacks specific writing assignment to fulfill the requirement.

A Very Brief Interlude—Two Days

I don’t believe in teaching to a test, AP or otherwise. However, I do want my students to be prepared for what they will encounter on a test that costs eighty-five bucks. So in order to acclimate them, I take example questions from previous AP tests and give them to my students to complete. Upon completion students read graded samples and exchange their essays for peer scoring to give themselves an idea of where they stand and what area require improvement.

Victorianism—Five Weeks

The Victorian era does not have the typical earmarks possessed by other periods like the Enlightenment or Romanticism, so we tend to view it as a transitional period bridging the gap between Romanticism and Modernism. Though we obviously have not delved into Modernism, students received an introduction to it the previous year in American literature so they have a basic understanding of the direction the period is moving. Through the study of Tennyson we see the incorporation of Romantic elements that continue to be seen all the way through Hopkins. In a rapidly changing industrializing world, however, a new darker voice begins to appear in many of the poets such as Arnold and Hardy.

While much of the technique found in the period is derivative, some new avenues can be explored provided by poets like Hopkins and Hardy. Hopkins’ development of sprung rhythm offers a revamping of sonnet structure that challenges students’ analytical skills. We particularly study the purpose and effect of this new technique. On the opposite side, Hardy’s stark simplicity highlights the starkness of the emerging twentieth century and foreshadows the everyday speech employed by Eliot.

In addition to the outside reading essay written during this unit, students will also tackle a dramatic monologue by Browning. After studying “My Last Duchess” and “Porphyria’s Lover” together, students are given the task of interpreting words of the old cleric in “The Bishop Orders His Tomb” in a formal essay. In addition to unraveling poetic technique, students must also apply rhetorical skills that will be honed in next year’s AP English Language course. They will, however, still apply larger concepts like purpose and exigence as well as other tools like connotation in unveiling the true nature of the corrupted bishop.

A Midsummer Night’s Dream—Two Weeks

This play doesn’t require nearly as much time as King Lear, which is good, because with all of Modernism still in front of us, the pressure is on to get everything in. We study Dream primarily in terms of its structure as a comedy in the tradition of the Roman New Comedy devised by Terence and Plautus. Through a dissection of its three phases we see how gimmicks are used (an illogical decree, a magic flower) in a tell-tale manner to produce predictable effects. We also take a bit of time to look at how similar formulae are used in the modern romantic-comedy.

Modernism—Five Weeks

For the year’s last unit we cover the British modernists. Though the advent of the period is rather arbitrary, I have chosen World War I to begin a unit that delves deeply into disillusionment. By comparing the early war poetry of Rupert Brooke to the later poetry of Sassoon and Owen, students see how a specific event (rather than a more undefined “period”) transforms the way people view the world and the manner in which art is expressed.

The particular ways that this disillusionment manifested itself is the topic of much of the remaining unit. Several poems by T.S. Eliot highlight the loss of the individual soul in modern society as people are carried along by inertia and little else. Auden complements the isolation and anonymity of modern man in poems like “The Unknown Citizen” and “Musee des Beaux Arts.” Yeats portrays the rapid decay of society as well as individual disillusionment. In addition to these we also look at brief selections from Spender and Thomas.

The twentieth century gives us our first sustained opportunity of examining fiction, particularly the short story. Through stories by Joyce, Woolf, Mansfield, Lawrence we are able to study concepts like Phelan’s progression and Rabinowitz’s method of signification to find themes. Of course, we closely study properties of Modernist fiction—stream of consciousness narrative and heavy irony. In order to accomplish this we must focus on the narrator’s point of view and various rhetorical techniques for managing a given narrative, such as Mansfield’s penchant for loading a character’s observations into the narrator’s third person observation. As for irony, we don’t only notice that it exists, but we strive to answer the question, “What purpose does it serve in this particular work?”

In addition to the short story, we also look at several essays, one of which is Huxley’s “Words and Behavior.” Students write an essay in which they first analyze his argument and then provide their own answer. Of particular concern for students will be the validity of Huxley's view of war, government and the media almost seventy years later.

(This essay fulfills the following requirement.)

The course includes frequent opportunities for students to write and rewrite formal, extended analyses and timed, in-class responses. The course requires writing to evaluate: analytical, argumentative essays in which students draw upon textual details to make and explain judgments about a work's artistry and quality, and its social and cultural values.

Lacks specific writing assignment to fulfill the requirement

The final essay of the year challenges students to write an elegant comparison / contrast paper in which they juxtapose poetry and music. The poetry can be selected from anything they have read through the course of the year or outside readings (upon my approval). Students may choose one work by each or several works by a given poet or musician. The main thrust of the assignment is to get them once and for all past the Ven Diagram approach to comparison / contrast. Rather than tedious point by point comparisons, they will look at larger themes and then trickle down to how those themes are expressed through imagery, rhythm, point of view, diction, etc. All this must be developed while maintaining a tight focus.

Room 112

College Board Approved

*Note: It needs to be noted that our school operates on a Block 8 schedule. I only see my students every other day for 85 minutes. Our curriculum has also been designed so that the students move through a progression of skills and literature from freshman year that build on each other. These students are selected by the department based on standardized test scores, a department placement test, eighth grade recommendations and grades. Students are not allowed to take the AP English Literature and Composition class nor the AP College English (English Language and Composition) class unless they have successfully completed Honors Freshman English and Honors American Literature.

Course Objectives: First semester--fiction; Second semester--non-fiction

"An AP course in English Language and Composition engages students in becoming skilled readers of prose written in a variety of periods, disciplines, and rhetorical contexts and in becoming skilled writers who compose for a variety of purposes" (The College Board AP Course Description May 1997, p. 5) First semester will focus on world literature and its relation to the audience. There is a rigorous reading schedule and numerous writing assignments involving the reader's response. During second semester we will more closely examine rhetoric and its functions, effects, and appeals to you, the audience, and you the writer. The class is in preparation for the AP exam in May. The

Grading System: First semester

Exams 45%: Most of the exams are a combination of in-class, timed writing prompts and multiple choice questions. Some tests are based on readings from class assignments while others are new material that students analyze for the first time to demonstrate knowledge of rhetorical strategies.

Research paper 25%: The first semester research paper will focus on literary criticism and analysis. Students will research and examine a type of literary criticism and evaluate the story "Young Goodman Brown" by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Students will write rough drafts to be edited by their peers and also have mini-conferences with the teacher in the initial stages of the research process. The students will also travel to Northern Illinois University to become familiar with a college library and to use the library for research purposes.

Reader responses 15%: For every reading assignment, students will write a 1-2 page reader response that will examine the student's thought process during reading in relation to the author's text. Students will also examine some rhetorical devices the author uses.

Quizzes 15%: Quizzes are used to check for basic reading and understanding of the assignment. Quizzes include but are not bound to vocabulary, grammar, and comprehension.

Class discussion is an essential component to the class. All students are expected to participate.

Grading for Spring Semester

Exams/quizzes 45%: Most of the exams are a combination of in-class, timed writing prompts and multiple choice questions. Some tests are based on readings from class assignments while others are new material that students analyze for the first time to demonstrate knowledge of rhetorical strategies. Quizzes will focus on grammar and mechanics.

Research paper 25%: The research paper for second semester is an argumentative paper based on Inquiry and Genre: Writing to Learn in College by David A. Jolliffe. Students will examine a problem within their community or society, research the problem, and offer solutions. Students will write rough drafts to be edited by their peers and also have mini-conferences with the teacher in the initial stages of the research process. Students will also present their papers and findings using other media (ex: power point) to their peers and be responsible for defending their argument.

Rhetorical analysis 15%: Students will write analyses of reading assignments that include an examination of exigency, audience, logos, ethos, pathos, and structural tools (schemes, tropes, grammar, syntax, and diction). Students will evaluate a peer's analysis and offer suggestions for improvement. Students will edit their responses and submit final copies.

Partner presentations 15%: Students will work together to organize class discussion on an essay from the Introduction to Great Books series two and three. Students will focus on text meaning and rhetorical devices the authors use. Class discussion is essential for the students to clarify their ideas in this forum.

Course Organization

The course is organized into two separate semesters. First semester focuses on world literature and how writers achieve effect through various rhetorical choices. Second semester focuses on non-fiction and rhetorical devices and techniques a writer uses to achieve purpose. Both semesters, however, focus on the student as a writer and how to become more effective writers.

Each semester requires students to focus on vocabulary, to employ Standard English grammar, and to understand the devices used to achieve style. Students will also write and study a variety of genres including narrative, expository, and argumentative essays about a variety of topics. During second semester, students will also evaluate visual images and their relation to text, meaning, and effect.

Composition:

- Reader responses are due for each reading assignment. Reader responses are for students to write affectively to clarify a text. Students need to discuss how the author achieves purpose and tone to affect audience. Students will peer edit each other's responses, checking for specific skills that are the focus of the assignment. Students will provide feedback and then edit their papers.
- In-class timed essays
 - The first week of class students are given a former timed, in-class AP essay on Neil Postman's contrasts of 1984 and A Brave New World.

- In-class essays on Edith Hamilton's Mythology
 - In-class timed essay on short stories
 - In-class timed essay on Hamlet
 - In-class timed essay on outside reading
- Research papers for first semester focus on literary criticism styles and analysis. Students are given lectures on Traditional, Formalistic, Historical-biographical, Psychoanalytical, and Archetypal branches of criticism. Students are to research in-depth one of these families of criticism and then critique the story "Young Goodman Brown" using that method of criticism. Students turn in rough drafts for peer revision.
 - Students need to make appointments with the teacher to discuss the draft and final copy of their papers.
 - Students are instructed how to properly cite sources using MLA.
 - The teacher will provide feedback before and after the student revises his work either in written form on the paper itself or by conferencing with the student for the research paper.
 - Strategies will be used to help students focus and develop their skills with organization to increase coherence by means of repetition, transitions, and emphasis. Students will complete and discuss exercises from the AP Summer Institute (2005, DePaul University) given by David Joliffe and then examine their own writing to apply these techniques.
 - Strategies from the Summer AP Institute (2005, DePaul University) will be used to help students develop their skills in illustrative detail. Students will complete and discuss the exercises and then apply these techniques to their own writing.
 - The instructor will use students' writing for example and class discussion to help students develop their skills in organization and illustrative detail. Students will be asked to edit passages of student writing and place the passages on overhead transparencies for class discussion.

Strategies:

- Students receive instruction using information from David Joliffe's Everyday Use and Inquiry and Genre: Writing to Learn in College and supplemental resources from the AP Summer Institute 2005 at DePaul University taught by Joliffe. These strategies include identifying rhetorical frameworks in writing--exigency, audience, purpose, logos, ethos, pathos, and structure and form. Since first semester focuses on fiction, students will examine how authors achieve effect through rhetorical devices.

Video/Visual images:

- "An Inconvenient Truth" Al Gore
- Students will make observation charts and document how the visual images that Gore uses affect the audience's perception. The visual images include charts, graphs, and pictures that show climate change over time. The visuals directly affect the audience and enhance his pathos, ethos, and logos. Students will question the validity and intent for these visuals that are used in the presentation. Students will then write a short response on how images are used in other media for the effect of persuasion and how a reader or audience should question the validity of such visual images.

- Students will analyze the documentary for its rhetorical value and write a letter to their state senator. (letters may or may not be sent--it depends)
- Students will choose and analyze print advertisements and identify the pathos, logos, and ethos of several advertisements. They will write a reflective paper on how these visual images relate to any written text and audience. The students will present their findings to the rest of the class where class discussion will lead us to how visual images serve as alternate forms of text themselves.
- Students will use the website <http://cagle.msnbc.com/politicalcartoons/> to find a political cartoon and present a short essay discussing the intent/meaning of the political cartoon as it relates to current events. Students will discuss how the cartoon becomes a form of text itself.

Style: Students move into more sophisticated concepts of style second semester. Our discussions and practice will help them to evaluate and recognize these important elements of schemes and tropes. Our study will include parallelism, zeugma, anastrophe, parenthesis, ellipsis, asyndeton, alliteration, anaphora, anadiplosis, antimetabole, synecdoche, metonymy, personification, irony, oxymoron, and paradox. Students will also write imitation exercises such as "Why I Want a Husband" and a mock of Stevenson's "Cat Bill" in which they invent their own bill and response. They will also write an imitation essay entitled "The Ways We Cheat" after reading Ericson's essay "The Ways We Lie." Students will also exchange each other's assignments and annotate the text for rhetorical devices.

Composition:

- Rhetorical analyses: Students will be required to submit a 1-2 page analysis for readings. Each reading assignment focuses on a certain rhetorical device and particular genre of writing (narrative, descriptive, expository, argumentative). Students will trade their analyses with each other and provide a written feedback for several but not all of the assignments.
- Imitation exercises: Imitation exercises will aid students to understand authors' rhetorical techniques. Students will write several of these including "The Ways We Cheat," "Why I Want a Husband," and "_____ Bill" to accompany "The Ways We Lie," "Why I Want a Wife" and "Cat Bill" texts.
- The teacher will provide feedback before and after the student revises his work either in written form on the paper itself or by conferencing with the student for all writing assignments.
 - ✓ Strategies will be used to help students focus and develop their skills with organization to increase coherence by means of repetition, transitions, and emphasis. Students will complete and discuss exercises from the AP Summer Institute (2005, DePaul University) given by David Joliffe and then examine their own writing to apply these techniques.
